“ Bill would be busier than Wylie Coyote with an ACME rocket strapped to his back, getting ready for Friday night bingo. I'd walk in and say, "Hi Bill! How's it goin'?"
Bill would stop dead in his tracks and glare at me, "Who wants to know?"
I don't know how he did it, but Bill's 'glare' always twinkled a little. There was a kindness behind his eyes that radiated out to those around him, even when he would regale me with the military insults that show friendship in our Band of Brothers. I spent many afternoons with Bill on his porch, where we discussed and solved the World's problems together, and I feel his loss deeply. I believe those he leaves behind, though, will all take a part of Bill with them. I'll take with me the 'twinkle' that was never absent behind his kind eyes. I visited Bill on his last day. When I left, I told him to rest easy, get well, and I saluted him. Through the pain he was in, with all the wires and tubes attached, Bill found the strength to raise his arm and return the salute. I will miss you, Bill. i will miss you.
