“ He was one of those people that I knew I liked from the first time we met. We were both recent high school graduates sitting in the classroom of new recruits of the FBI in Washington, D.C., in 1959. We found ourselves sharing an apartment together, which better fit our misguided self images of making our mark in the world better than the 90 year old boarding houses that housed us on our first night away from home.

The experiences we enjoyed as well as suffered through (mostly self-imposed) all went towards tempering the characters of both of us like the proverbial "Steel sharpening steel." I always admired his determination to finish any task he started.

We both got married, lived in Atlanta, and toured around the South with our wives in our sports cars. He worked as the night clerk in the Atlanta Field Office of the FBI, and took a full load of subjects to graduate as a chemical engineer from Ga, Tech,. (No small task.) Like I said, he had determination.

His job after graduating took him and his family to Texas, and while we were apart geographically, we caught up often, and it was always like we had just seen each other yesterday,

It was like that when we saw him as he was packing up to leave Texas to go to Arkansas. We had a good lunch together and told a few stories about our times together and then parted for the last time.

I'll end by saying good-bye, old friend, and I'll tell anyone that I liked me best when I was with you.
